The Global Warming Book of Revelations offers insights into the religion of global warming science. It provides explanations as to why media, industry, government, universities, scientists and individuals ignore scientific reason in favour of scary rhetoric and potentially disastrous global agreements. The book outlines how average citizens are affected by increasing taxes and inane government rules.

The public adopted global warming under the umbrella of a seemingly altruistic movement. Instead, it promotes the interests of large corporations, world institutions and non-governmental groups.

In this religion, faith has superseded reason. Adam reveals how misguided it is to cling to authoritative climate change leaders the way we once blindly followed priests and popes. Loud voices chide: "If we don't act what will we tell our children?" Adam worries what we'll tell them if we do act.

Charlene Adam is a housewife and mother of three daughters. Daily stints of mediation between these battling siblings should qualify Adam for a Nobel Prize (unlike a few recent laureates, she's done something to deserve one). The Sceptical Housewife has accomplished a rare achievement. She's applied her English and Sociology degree in a related field: she's a part-time humour and pet columnist for the Winnipeg Free Press. Frugal to the core, Adam found a way to prevent 12 years of Catholic training and three years of university religious courses from going to waste. She's authored a book about a popular religion: Global Warming.
